I'm taking a minute to let you know that a few days ago, I received an article titled "Nuremberg Rally: 4 Key Points to Consider" from Streetwise Auto. It's ironic because this time last month, I was requesting that people take a "critical eye" to the same article. So why change our stance on the same auto dealer's tactic on the same platform with approximately 10 days left in our efforts to force them to reduce their prices by at least 20%? When you read this article and "get it," you will probably also be wondering whether it's too little, too late to make a difference. The fact is, it is exactly that. The overwhelming majority of auto dealers today are not going to be influenced by price information from any source. One of the most important factors is that they know full well how loyal their customers are. They will make sure to lose the customers they need to survive before they change their mind about price. The biggest mistake you can make is to assume that an auto dealer or any other business will respond to your efforts to force price reductions. It's not just that they won't listen. They will see you as just one more group of tough competitors trying to impose their will on them. The bottom line is that dealers are big business. They are not going to respond to a competitor's attempt to undermine them. In their business, the customer is king. So we would advise you to use what will work, which is to simply go to your dealer and demand that they reduce their prices. It's that simple. They will know that their business will suffer if they don't do so.
