The rate at which I learn about photo editing software has outpaced reviewing it, driven by more photos and more hours spent in front of a computer screen. By the time I got around to reviewing Lightroom a few months ago, the software had gained about half a dozen tools I use frequently. The other half are no longer developed for Lightroom, but are still available in Photoshop. It's not enough for the novices to have filters and color-curve button. I always knew RS Color Curves would be my favorite feature. Whether I'm correcting skin tones or wrangling noise, I want to know whether black can be a little whiter, or red a little more vivid. A label that chides me for not paying attention to the corners of my images is no substitute for providing me with precise control. Adobe has done the best that they can with this feature. However, Lightroom's spreadsheets cannot compare to MyPaintedTable, which I believe would have been the ultimate tool for reviewing any image you submitted or downloaded from a large quantity of files. No, Adobe will probably never achieve this, but I hope they will someday, because there's no other means for presenting large numbers of image backdrops to a client, other than timelines or PPT files. As I write this, MyPaintedTable is the #1 free app in the iTunes app store for macOS, a known indicator of its popularity and utility. Adobe creative toolset is a crowd favourite, so I hope that MyPaintedTable can gain market share from it and become the best utility for generating timelines. This is the perfect case for the power of open-source software. The open-source community, which already excels at software development for professionals and home-users, could make a beautiful addition to Photoshop and Lightroom's user experience.

GIF: coloring images with text overlays A powerful tool for editing images is the color overlay feature in Photoshop. The process of adding a matching color to an image is straightforward. First, you open the image in Photoshop (If you have the colored text itself, you need to have the colored text files in the same directory as the image). Next, you change the opacity of the text layer and open up the text tool, selecting a colored text font. Next, you position the text over the image, keeping the distance between the text and the image unchanged. Finally, you click directly on the painted area in the image and select Color Overlay from the palette. This will change the color in that area from blended image colors to the color of the overlaid text.
